

VIOLENCE AGAINST DALIT WOMEN IN INDIA

¹ASTHA JOSHI

¹*Research Scholar, Delhi University*

²Mrs. SARIKA MALIK

²*Assistant professor Delhi University*

Received July 12th, 2018; Revised August 31st, 2018; Accepted September 22th, 2018

ABSTRACT

The practice of untouchability had virtually dehumanized a significant section of Indian society, that they lost their persona and all the basic human rights ad fundamental rights. Indian society is a male dominated society; all men dominate women. The article makes two primary arguments. The article concludes by discussing broader implications for international human rights activism by other aggrieved groups. In India, women are considered as Shakti, since mythological times. This raises a lot of question about the attitude and our thinking of our society. Women, usually looked as a weaker sex and forced to play secondary role in the society and are often neglected, discriminated and oppressed. These discrimination and oppression has adversely affected the development process. Government of India abolished untouchably but the practice is followed in some part of India.
